

Are You Capturing Enough to See the Pattern Later?

The Joint Commission's NPG 2a is increasing attention on structured workplace violence programs, including meaningful incident information, follow-up, trend visibility, and governing-body oversight.

When workplace violence occurs, does your incident data give you what you'll need to understand the pattern, not just the individual event?

STEP 01 Identify

Recognize and classify events consistently

STEP 02 Capture

Collect information using a structured approach

STEP 03 Understand

See recurring patterns and change over time

STEP 04 Improve

Focus prevention and improvement efforts

THE SAFETYZONE WORKPLACE VIOLENCE FORM

A structured approach to capturing workplace violence information consistently from the start.

The issue usually isn't a lack of incident data. It's whether workplace violence information is captured with enough structure to understand later.

WHAT ARE YOU CAPTURING TODAY?

- Who was involved, and what was their relationship to your organization?
- What type of incident occurred, and was a weapon involved?
- Were there contributing circumstances, such as being alone with the aggressor or in an unfamiliar location?
- Was the incident reported to the applicable regulatory office, and were follow-up notifications completed?

WHAT COULD CONSISTENT DATA HELP YOU SEE?

You can't identify a pattern you didn't consistently capture.

Are particular types of workplace violence events recurring? Are patterns emerging across locations, circumstances, or time periods? Are prevention or improvement efforts changing what you're seeing over time?

THE NEXT STEP

Capture it Consistently Today. Learn from it Tomorrow.

Individual incident reports tell you what happened. Consistently structured workplace violence data creates the foundation for understanding what may be happening repeatedly. Structured data also creates a stronger foundation for future trend analysis and leadership reporting: once your organization is consistently capturing workplace violence information, Clarity Reporting Services becomes the natural next step, turning accumulated data into trends, leadership summaries, and governing-body-ready reporting.
